Times technology correspondent James Dean says Apple has the knack of making people "want something they didn't know they wanted". However, he too reckons the reliance on an iPhone and a battery life of just 18 hours mean "its popularity may be restricted to Apple's most loyal fans". He adds: "It's too early to say if it will flop but, like Google Glass, launch-day hysteria does not always translate into widespread adoption."

Obama is unusual in that he continually fails to play by the rules established by the U.S. Constitution and more than 200 years of self-government. He likes to push the envelope yet, unlike Presidents Bill Clinton and Jimmy Carter before him, there isn't a single member of his party who appears willing to call him out on it. Contrast that with Presidents Ronald Reagan or either George Bush, all of whom had to face down scads of Republicans calling for their heads anytime they stepped out of line or tried to change the way business was done.
