On the edge of Forward Operating Base Hammer, where I lived, were several small hills, raised mounds on the otherwise frying-pan-flat desert. These were "tells" — ancient villages. For thousands of years, people in Iraq, as throughout the Middle East, used sun-dried bricks to build homes and walls. The bricks lasted about 20 years before crumbling, at which point the people rebuilt on top of the old foundation. After a couple of rounds, the buildings sat on a small hill.

When Brooklyn-born Roy Boe helped found the Islanders in 1972, little did he know the effect he would have on the well-established Rangers. To head off the fledgling World Hockey Association and the New York Raiders from making Nassau Coliseum home, the Islanders swept in and began play in Uniondale, L.I., with mostly minor-leaguers and NHL castoffs. They went 12-60-6 that first season in 1972-73, the worst-ever to that point. A big-time rivalry with the neighboring Rangers seemed almost impossible. It took over a year for the Islanders to beat the Rangers, and it took over another year to get a second — both times on Long Island.
