Since each options contract represents a 100 shares of the underlying ETF, the net cost of the trade would be about $37 million. This is a spread bet - the investor collects a premium by selling the puts at the $94 strike price, while his purchase at the $102 strike price starts to become profitable as the fund's price falls.

Meanwhile, Yanis Varoufakis, the finance minister, has sent a rather thin list of proposed reforms to his euro zone counterparts in advance of a meeting on March 9. He has also raised the possibility of holding a second election or a referendum if Greece met with intransigence from its creditors, although it is unclear whether such a possible appeal to the voters would be the precursor to further U-turns by the government or an exit from the euro or might have some other purpose. Varoufakis will have much explaining to do.
